

Randstad publishes report on flexible labour and employment

Randstad, the multinational human resource consultant, has published the findings of its research into flexible labour in a report entitled Flexibility@Work 2013.

The publication focuses on the increasing demand for flexible employment and the role which agency workers can play in helping companies retain a competitive edge. An increase in the number of agency workers worldwide has drawn attention to the way in which the phenomenon may affect business recruitment strategy.

This increased flexibility should benefit both workers, who may look to balance work with care commitments or qualification pursuits, and companies who seek to fill temporary positions quickly and efficiently. Agency work is therefore plays a key part in bringing about a smart, sustainable and inclusive economy.

For more details on how flexible employment affects countries across the world, download the Flexibility@Work 2013 report

source: CSR Europe

13/06/2013